Supporting Standards-Based Differentiation Strategies for Special Populations

Standards-based instruction requires rigorous teaching and learning strategies for all students, including our historically marginalized populations of students with disabilities (SWDs) and English learners (ELs). And yet, knowing how to appropriately differentiate instruction for SWDs and ELs remains an important area of continuous learning.

Surveys conducted by the Center on Standards, Alignment, Instruction, and Learning (C-SAIL) reveal how strongly principals and teachers desire guidance for teaching grade-level standards to SWDs and ELs.

This C-SAIL webinar series is a response to these calls for guidance. Join us each month to learn how other educational leaders—principals, district administrators, state policymakers, and researchers—grapple with the challenge of differentiated instruction.

About C-SAIL: Located at the University of Pennsylvania, the Center on Standards, Alignment, Instruction, and Learning (C-SAIL) examines how college- and career-readiness standards are implemented, if they improve student learning, and what instructional tools measure and support their implementation.
